"Night Blooming," is a beehive-like dome on the Lost Meadow Trail. Sunlight comes through gaps in the structure and can look like shooting stars in the middle of the day. It is made of old-growth tamarack and fir that had originally used to build grain silos in eastern Washington in the first half of the 20th century.

~ Taiji Miyasaka and David Drake, Artists

Can you follow the path sunlight would use to shoot out of this amazing sculpture?